THE WHITE HOUSE

AS IT APPEARS TO THE NAKED EYE OF THE PUBLIC.

Foot Walk-The Entrance and Vestibule-Furniture and Decorations-On the Second Floor-Cabinet Room.

The White House is truly beautiful, and White House as it strikes the average caller. It is a great white building of two stories and a basement with a porte cochere in its front and an iron railing tipped with brass gilding at the side. It has a big lawn in front of it and there is a fountain spouting up a spray in the center of this. The front door is reached by a creesent of asphalt drives, in the top of which lies this porte cochere. This asphalt is cracked in places and it gives back all the rays of the sun during the heated summer months. Along its si le runs a foot walk as wide as an ordinary pavement, and the material of this is plain sandstone in blocks about two feet

The landing under the porte cochere is of the same ordinary sandstone, and as you go up to it you can look over the iron railing and see the president's servant ironing his shirts and other unmentionable family garments in the laundry of the basement. Raising your eyes, you note that Holland shades of a cream color cover the windows of the

This card is made of tin, and upon it black letters are painted the words:

"Open 10 a. m., closed 2 p. m." It was after 2 o'clock when I called and signed for this door. It is as big around as cut into its brass face.

Entering the White House through these big front doors you first stand in a great vestibule or hall. This is a conglomeration of the grand and the cheap. The floor is of tiled mosaic, and probably cost several dol lars a square foot. The wall before you was made by Tiffany. It shuts you off from the grand corridor where the guests promen nie at the state receptions, and in which the portraits of all the presidents hang. It is a splendid piece of glass mosaic which shines like so many jewels in the evening The chandelier in the center of this vesti bule is a beauty and the walls and the ceilings are fresceed. Thus far the room is beautiful. But look around you. cheap rough cocoa door mats lie upon the mesaic floor. The woodwork of the vestibule has been grained to represent black walnut, and varnished, and this varnish is cracked like an old picture. Beside the door entering the hall, which leads to the second story, there is a walnut umbrellastand which would be dear at $5, and in the 318 Congress St.
